In a statement released Thursday, the London-based human rights group, citing a report from The Times, said British officials are said to have transferred at least 124 children, including babies, to al-Zarqawi, the leader of the terrorist organization of the same name. In an opinion piece published in the Guardian, Ian Cobain, a former MI6 officer, alleged the children were sent to Syria to be used as suicide bombers. The government's children's service, the National Society for the Protection of Cruelty (NSPCC), is among those quoted in the Times report, which says that the government knew of the transfers but failed to raise the alarm. "The government has been aware of the story that more than 100 children have been taken out of the U.K. and sent to Iraq to be used in suicide bombings," said Lee Jasper, executive director of the NSPCC. "The government has known about this for some time but has failed to act. This is tragic and shocking. The government must act." The NSPCC said it had been given information from reputable sources that put the number of children moved between Iraq and Syria at "hundreds." "The government must now give the British public the answers it needs about how this abuse came to light," Jasper added. The NSPCC's head of operations, Chris Hutchings, said: "We are asking those who received the children for their help. "It is vital the government and those who received the children to help us get the answers we need." The Foreign Office, which is responsible for the country's foreign service, said it could not comment on the case. Earlier this week, the House of Commons Culture, Media and Sport Committee released a report saying that British military intelligence officials, many of whom are now in the private sector, helped to facilitate the flow of weapons, money, and fighters from Libya into Syria. For the first time, the committee said, it had found evidence of the links between foreign-based security contractors, both British and American, and the Syrian government. It also found evidence to show that
